ABOUT THE SEMINAR

FEDERALISM IN INDIA: PROSPECTS & PITFALLS

The Indian federal system has become transformed in the last seven decades—from being dismissed as a full-fledged federal system to a widely acclaimed federal system in the world. Simply put, Indian federalism has become more meaningful and functional post-liberalization. It goes without saying that India's command economy, in fact, a mixed economy model has led to widespread corruption and inefficiency in the government. It has also affected Centre–state relations with the principles of federalism often being held hostage by the Centre.

From a subordinate position until the late 1980s, states rose to occupy a strategic position in India's move from a command economy to a market economy. No wonder, therefore, the Centre became more interested in involving states in even forbidden area such as foreign policy matters. States are not only competing but also learning from each other. Judiciary in India has also played some important role in curtailing the power of the central government. Judicial acceptance of federalism as basic structure of the Constitution has had significant implications on Centre–state relations in India.

The role of Governors remains an important challenge for centre-state relations in India. A major challenge for India is that of inter-regional disparities. Reducing such disparities is essential for the success of fiscal federalism. River water sharing has posed another challenge to the management of federalism. Given the spurt in discovery of offshore reserves of hydrocarbons and given the huge rents from such vast resources, which so far have remained under the preserve of the Centre, they now need to be shared. How to share these rents has become a major issue of fiscal federalism today.

Apart from resource federalism, green federalism is another big challenge for our federalism. Our existing inter-governmental transfer system does not adequately recognize environmental externalities. For example, states with large forests are seeking compensation for the environmental services they provide to the entire federation. It has long been argued that federalism creates a marketplace for public policy, in which the best policies are replicated across units. Centrally Sponsored Schemes also known as discretionary transfers, among others, have been great obstacles in laboratory federalism in India.
