a Research Results:

Security breaches or research results from others, as well as data manipulation, misrepresentation, or biased reporting with the purpose to mislead or deceive, is unethical. The findings of research should be documented and required to be so that they can be analysed and reviewed. The information should be stored for a reasonable time after publication and made available upon request. Exceptions may be appropriate in some cases to safeguard privacy, ensure patent protection, or for other similar reasons.

b Authorship:

Everyone who has made a major contribution must be given the opportunity to be recognized as an author/ co-author. Other people who have helped with the project should also be recognized. All authors, both academic and corporate, should report a complete disclosure of their current institutional affiliations in their articles.

c Plagiarism:

It is not allowed to plagiarize text from other papers without correctly crediting the source (plagiarism) or to publish several papers with nearly identical information by the same authors (self-plagiarism). It is unethical to submit the same results to many journals at the same time. The review articles are an exception. It is not permissible for authors to present results gained from others as if they were their own. Authors should acknowledge the work of others who have impacted the direction and course of their research and mention publications that have provided the path for their research.

d Duplicate Submission:

Parallel presentations of the same Research Article / Manuscript to multiple Conferences / Journals are not permitted. If it is discovered that the submitted article has been duplicated elsewhere, it will be eliminated without consideration.
